DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Paralleling the Appomattox River at its fall line, the Old Town Historic District¹ of Petersburg is situated in the city's earliest section. The district exhibits a varied collection of late 18th- through 20th-century architecture, including examples of both commercial and residential architecture in late Georgian, Federal, Greek Revival, Italianate, Second Empire, Queen Anne, and Colonial/Georgian Revival styles. In addition, notable groupings of mid- to late 19th-century warehouses and factories are found in the north and northeast sections of the district. The district is approximately 190 acres in area and encompasses over 250 buildings. The north boundary is the south side of the Appomattox River (including the Appomattox Bridge, linking vehicle traffic to Colonial Heights, and the Seaboard Air Line² Railroad bridge). East and west borders are marked respectively by the Seaboard Coast Line Railroad tracks and the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Bridge. The southern boundary is defined by the tracks of the Seaboard Coast Line Railroad (to just east of N. Davis Street) and the rear (southern) property lines of buildings facing the 200 block of High Street and W. Bank Street. The boundaries were determined by historical precedent, the architectural integrity of the site, and the hard edges provided by the river and the railroad tracks.

The topography of this section of Petersburg is relatively flat to the north and northeast with hills gradually rising to the south and southwest. The greatest change in topography is seen between streets appropriately named Low and High streets.

Early 19th-century maps indicate few changes have been made to Petersburg's street plan. Most streets within the district provide for two-way vehicle traffic and on-street parking. Heaviest traffic appears centered to the northeast at Bollingbrook and the entrance to the Appomattox Bridge, on N. Sycamore Street between W. Bank and Old streets, and along the length of Canal Street.

The district exhibits an equal distribution of residential, commercial, and industrial land use. Industrial buildings including freight warehouses and factories are concentrated to the north and northeast along Old, Pike, and River streets as well as on Bank Street, east of Third Street. Additional light and heavy industry is scattered randomly through the district with minor clusters on Grove Avenue and Canal and High streets. The railroad tracks enclosing the district visually complement the industrial image presented in these portions of the district.

Commercial and industrial activity is integrated along Old Street and the northeast section. Antique shops and popular boutique stores on Old Street display successful adaptive reuse of 19th-century industrial buildings. Small businesses flank W. Bank and N. Sycamore streets in late 19th- and 20th-century commercial buildings of varying quality and design. Most buildings in this area are of masonry construction, ranging from one to four stories in height.

Residential neighborhoods are located west of N. Market Street in the trapezoid-shaped area bounded by Grove Avenue and Canal, High, and N. Market streets. Residences range from substantial late 18th-century Georgian dwellings to mid-20th century builder ranch houses. Worker houses are strung along Grove Avenue and Cross, Plum, Gilliam, and portions of Canal streets. Middle- and upper-middle-class houses are concentrated on High Street. Both frame and brick construction were chosen as preferred building materials although cinder block houses are noted occasionally on Crostic Alley and Cross, Canal, Hurt, and Plum streets. Most houses in the district maintain a scale of one to two stories.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

An early Colonial settlement, Petersburg is one of Virginia's oldest cities. It first gained regional significance as the site of Fort Henry, an important mid-17th-century military fort in frontier America. By 1769 Petersburg had developed into the major tobacco center of Virginia. Its growth continued through the mid-19th century, when Petersburg emerged as a leading Virginia manufacturing and transportation center. In 1860 the city was served by four railroads and a canal system providing transportation facilities for local merchants and manufacturers as well as for regional farming interests. Although deeply scarred physically and economically by the Civil War, Petersburg's prosperity was soon renewed through the leaf tobacco, cotton, grain, peanut, and lumber industries.

In addition to its economic and historical development, Petersburg is significant for its diversity of residential, commercial, and industrial architecture. Virtually all styles of architecture popular in the United States from 1800 to 1910 are represented within the district's boundaries. Of special importance are the worker cottages from the period 1800-1830, clustered in the southwestern portions of the district, as well as the mid- to late 19th-century, middle- and upper-middle-class houses on High Street. Industrial buildings of varying size and distinction are located on W. Old, Pike and River streets and scattered throughout the northeast portions of the district. It is from this diversity of building type and quality and from the city's rich history, that the Old Town Historic District of Petersburg gains its significance.

Although the arrival date of the first European Settlers to the area now known as Petersburg remains a matter of conjecture, it is known that four Englishmen were killed there in the major Indian attack in 1622. General European settlement of the Appomattox River Valley occurred in the 1630s and by 1643 led to the formation of Bristol Parish. A second Indian attack in 1644 resulted in the establishment of Fort Henry the following year for "the defense of the inhabitants on the south side of the James River. . .".¹

Following the establishment of the fort, the Appomattox Indians, expelled earlier from towns at Bermuda Hundred and Swift Creek, established a village nearby at Indian Town Creek. The Indian and white communities are said to have existed in relative peace with each other.

During the next three decades, Fort Henry gained regional importance as a trading post and point of departure for expeditions to the south and west. Abraham Wood, commander of the garrison, was active in the promotion of the fort as a trade center and led exploratory expeditions into the nearby frontier. These lines of exploration eventually developed into a regional network of trade with the Indian population.

Wood's son-in-law, Peter Jones, succeeded him in the leadership of military affairs and Indian trade in 1675. A 19th-century historian recorded Jones "opened a trading establishment with the Indians, a few rods west of what is now the junction of Sycamore

7. DESCRIPTION

The Low Street Playground is the only park in the Petersburg Old Town Historic District. Comprising eight-tenths of one acre in area, the park is characterized by a flat, open green with a few centrally located weeping willows and a children's swing set.

Land densities vary across the district. Though 19th-century Petersburg was compactly built, only a few areas continue to exhibit this quality. Old Street, the nucleus of the district, still retains its high density with buildings two, three, and four stories in height standing against one another and observing virtually no setback from the street. Few of the district's remaining areas, however, continue to reflect their original 19th-century densities. Much of the commercial portion of the district has been compromised by the loss of buildings during the last ten years. The resulting vacant and parking lots detract from the area's sense of architectural continuity and historic integrity. Notably weak are the industrial areas east of N. Sycamore Street, Low Street, and the west side of Canal Street.

In spite of its losses, Petersburg holds a wide array of building types and styles spanning over two hundred years. Virtually every late 18th- and early 19th-century style of architecture popular in the United States is represented in the district. Noteworthy examples include the Strachan-Harrison house (302 Cross Street, mid- to late 18th century), the John F. May house (244 High Street, Federal, ca. 1810), six late Georgian/early Federal houses on High Street (265, 311, 320, 416, 545, and 614), and a fine collection of one and 1½-story worker houses dating to the first quarter of the 19th century (see inventory for Gilliam, Cross, Hurt, Low, and Canal streets, Pig Alley, and Grove Avenue).

An unusually fine cluster of Greek Revival and Italianate residences is found in the 300 block of Grove Avenue. A four-block area on High Street contains a rich mixture of 19th-century architecture including representatives of late Georgian, Federal, Greek Revival, Italianate, Second Empire, Romanesque Revival, Queen Anne, and Colonial/Georgian Revival styles.

Many of Petersburg's worker houses were erected following the conclusion of the Civil War. These single and double houses are of frame construction, two stories in height, capped by a gable roof, and four bays across. Examples of both single and double-pile houses are observed.

Commercial and industrial structures reflect a wide range of 19th- and early 20th-century architectural styles as well. The stone warehouse at the north end of N. Market Street is one of the earlier industrial buildings extant in the district. Built in 1809 this building has long enjoyed the reputation of being the 18th-century trading post of Peter Jones (Petersburg is said to be named after Peter Jones). Although documentation has shown this building not to be Jones's trading post, the stone structure continues to be of significance to the city.

Early commercial Federal and Italianate buildings are found in the area bounded by N. Market, Old, Second, and Bank streets. Of special importance are the Farmers' Bank (Federal, 1817) at 21 Bollingbrook Street and the Nathaniel Friend House (Federal, ca. 1816) at 27-29 Bollingbrook Street. The Exchange Building at 19 W. Bank Street is one of Petersburg's best examples of Greek Revival architecture. Designated a National Historic Landmark in 1969, this building has recently been restored and converted into a Civil War Museum. The Exchange Building, erected between 1840 and 1841, was designed by Mr. [?] Berrien of New York. Petersburg's only example of commercial Second Empire (ca. 1880) is the Julius Gilbert Building at 22 Bollingbrook Street.

Several industrial buildings wedged between Pike and River streets and the railroad tracks date to ca. 1855. The transitional Greek Revival/Italianate South Side Railroad Depot (ca. 1853) at the north end of Rock Street is of particular interest. Other significant buildings are the octagonal City Market, the Dunlop Factory, and the Appomattox Iron Works on Old Street and three warehouses east of Third Street on E. Bank Street.

Vernacular churches spot the district. The High Street United Methodist Church is one of the city's few examples of the Romanesque Revival style of architecture. Built in 1844 as a Greek Revival church, the building was enlarged and a new facade added in 1897. The Georgian Revival Church of Christ on High Street was erected ca. 1925 and serves as a formidable visual terminus to Canal Street.

Two bridges cross the Appomattox River connecting Petersburg with present-day Colonial Heights. The Seaboard Air Line Railroad bridge forms the district's west boundary. The deck-plate girder viaduct bridge was erected between 1930 and 1931 and reflects the joint design efforts of the Seaboard Air Line Railroad and the American Bridge Company of New York.

The second bridge in the district is the Second Street Viaduct or Appomattox Bridge, erected in 1925. Built on the site of Pocahontas Bridge, the Appomattox Bridge provides automotive access to Petersburg from Richmond and Colonial Heights. Prior to the construction of Interstate 95, this bridge was a vital link of U.S. Route 1, a major north-south route of the East Coast. Chief engineer on the design of the Appomattox Bridge was J. E. Greimer and Company.

Although Petersburg displays an amazing array of architectural styles, many buildings are in varying states of disrepair. Throughout the district vacant and parking lots exist where 19th-century buildings have been lost through deterioration, neglect, or vandalism. Many streets display buildings of recent construction not compatible with the established character, scale, and/or massing of the neighborhood. This situation occasionally leads to a loss of historic integrity to the site. However, recent efforts to revitalize the Old Town area are meeting with growing success. Tangible preservation and rehabilitation results are witnessed most dramatically along High Street (residential) and Old Street (commercial). The city enacted historic district zoning for most of the area in 1973. Revitalization efforts are led by the Historic Petersburg Foundation (a local preservation organization) and many local citizens.

and Old Streets. This position for trade was called 'Peter's Point,' subsequently changed to Petersburg."²

Concurrent with the development of Indian trade was the rise of Petersburg's tobacco industry. In 1730 inspection was authorized for a tobacco warehouse on the land of Colonel Robert Bolling at Bolling's Point.³ Two years later this permit was extended to include John Bolling's warehouse across the river, thus beginning a long line of warehouses in this locality. The area grew in prosperity with mills and stores soon following.

Petersburg was formally laid out in 1733 by William Byrd II. Byrd wrote on September 19, 1733,

8. SIGNIFICANCE

We laid the foundation of two large cities: one at Shacco's, to be called Richmond, and the other at the point of Appomattox River, to be named Petersburg....The truth of it is, these two places, being the uppermost landing of James and Appomattox rivers, are naturally intended for marts where the traffic of the outer inhabitants must center.⁴

As in most of the Tidewater area, streets in Petersburg and Richmond were laid in a simple grid. The plat of Byrd's plan has not survived.

Reflecting Petersburg's regional importance, the town officially incorporated on December 17, 1748. The town of Blandford, located just northeast of Petersburg, incorporated at the same time. Four years later, a third nearby town, Pocahontas, incorporated across the Appomattox to the north.⁵ Petersburg, itself, acquired twenty-eight additional acres to the west in 1762.⁶ The culmination of the area's 18th-century growth occurred in 1784 when these cities, Petersburg, Blandford, and Pocahontas, along with the recent subdivision Ravencroft, merged into the borough of Petersburg.⁷

By the 1760s Petersburg flourished as a center of tobacco and milling industries. Traveler Roger Atkinson described the importance of tobacco to pre-Revolutionary Petersburg when he wrote in 1769,

When tobacco is not to be got at these Petersburg's warehouses it is not to be got anywhere else in Virginia. Perhaps it may not be generally known - but there is more land and more good land and more inhabitants (and these yearly increasing) on ye south side of James River than there is in all Virginia besides. There is more tobacco in these Warehouses than there is in all York or James River besides from head to foot.⁸

With the falls of the Appomattox River providing power for its mills, Petersburg developed a substantial flour industry, as well. Wheat soon became second only to tobacco in importance to the town's economy. "Besides ye very valuable staple of tobacco..." Atkinson wrote one year later, "of late wheat, than which no country under the sun produces better, and that in great abundance-I say ye article of wheat, a kind of second staple, is a prodigious addition...."⁹

Due to its regional importance, Petersburg was a major British military target during the American Revolution. In April 1781 British ships sailed up the Appomattox intent on destroying tobacco and seizing public stores. Though the local militia made a strong effort, including a stand at what is now Fifth Street, they were finally forced to retreat over Pocahontas Bridge.

The damage to Petersburg was extensive. General Henry Lee wrote,

Petersburg, the great mart of that section of the state...ranked first among commercial towns of the state. Its chief export was tobacco... and at this time its warehouses were filled. In addition...this town had become a place of depot for all imported supplies required for southern operations.¹⁰

"Everything valuable was destroyed by the British and the wealth of this town in a few hours disappeared."¹¹

Peace ushered in a new period of prosperity and growth. As noted above, the towns of Petersburg, Blandford, and Pocahontas merged and incorporated as Petersburg in May 1784. Tobacco warehouses, flour mills, stores, and small manufacturing ventures dominated the local economy. Jedidiah Morse in his American Gazetteer of 1797 described Petersburg ten years after the war. Petersburg, he wrote,

...contains about 300 houses, built irregularly...There are several tobacco warehouses, stores of dry goods, and some few neat and commodious dwelling houses.... It contains 2,828 inhabitants, including 1,265 slaves. The situation of the town is low and rather unhealthy."¹² Flour processed in Petersburg's mills exceeded 60,000 barrels per year. Trade exports amounted to over one million dollars. Shipping in 1805 totaled 5,594 tons.¹³

Civic improvements were undertaken to refute charges that Petersburg was an unhealthy town. The marsh was filled and streets were repaired. Bank Street was created around 1800 to connect High and Back (now E. Bank) streets. Bollingbrook, Petersburg's principal street, was paved in 1813.¹⁴

On July 16, 1815, fire consumed nearly two-thirds of Petersburg. Virtually all property on Market Square, Bollingbrook, Old, Bank, and Back streets was destroyed. A citizen's report issued following the fire noted,

A few days ago the town of Petersburg was prosperous and flourishing - commerce crowded its wharves - a busy population thronged its streets - and new buildings, daily erected, announced its increasing wealth and importance.

In one awful night the whole scene was changed; a fire...has involved the larger portion of our citizens in distress, and reduced many of them to beggary.¹⁵

The city quickly engaged in an energetic rebuilding program with three hundred buildings of brick construction erected during the next two years.

Joseph Martin chronicled the city's renewed strength when he wrote in 1835, "The number of houses besides the county buildings, which are handsome, may be estimated at about 800...There are six tobacco factories, six manufacturing flour mills, 1 brass and cast-iron foundry, 2 earthen-ware potteries, 2 cotton-seed-oil mills, numerous mercantile stores and 4 druggist shops....Petersburg," Martin concluded, "has become salubrious as any part of lower Virginia; and has the character of being hospitable and patriotic; and a very delightful place of residence."¹⁶ In addition to tobacco and flour, cotton manufacture also had become a major local industry with three factories employing over three hundred workers.¹⁷

Demographic studies reveal Petersburg's population swelled from 8,322 in 1830 to 14,010 in 1850. By 1854 it was estimated to be 18,000, placing Petersburg third in Virginia with respect to population.¹⁸ Just prior to the Civil War the city possessed a race track, a theater, and numerous taverns and is said to have overshadowed Richmond in popularity.

Petersburg's unchecked growth during the first half of the 19th century was stimulated greatly by the arrival of the railroad in 1830. Sixty miles of track were laid by the Petersburg Railroad to Weldon, North Carolina, by 1833. Other railroads quickly following were the City Point Railroad (chartered 1836); the Southside Railroad to Lynchburg (completed in 1854); and the Norfolk and Petersburg Railroad through the Dismal Swamp (completed in 1858). These railroads, coupled with the extensive routes of the upper Appomattox Canal Company, made Petersburg a major transportation center for the South.

The unrivaled prosperity of Petersburg during the 1850s ended with the Civil War. With its numerous railroads allowing supplies to reach Richmond, Petersburg became a primary Union target. The siege of Petersburg lasted ten months with extensive shelling of the Old Town area. The fall of the city on April 2, 1865, was a major turning point in the war and led to the surrender at Appomattox one week later.

The city rebuilt itself after the war with major industries being tobacco, cotton, grain, peanuts, and lumber. Although by 1880 over seventy new industries had emerged, including sumac, fertilizers, veneers, crates, baskets, trunks and bags,¹⁹ Petersburg never regained its former prominence. The shift in demand from plug tobacco to cigarettes during the early 20th century, together with the moving of cotton interests to North Carolina, led to a period of decline.

Aside from its rich historical associations, Petersburg is significant for its diverse collection of late 18th- and 19th-century architecture. The variety of historical periods, building types, and building styles represented is the Old Town district's greatest asset. Commercial and residential architecture alike range from the vernacular to complex architect-designed schemes; from simple, early 19th-century, 1½-story, frame workers' cottages to prodigious Federal and Greek Revival town houses; from Reconstruction frame, 2-story, double-pile "I" houses to large, brick, Queen Anne mansions.

8. SIGNIFICANCE

Industrial architecture, located for the most part in the center and eastern portions of the district, includes pre-Civil War railroad buildings, late 19th-century factories and tobacco warehouses, an ironworks, an ice company, a luggage factory, and several early 20th-century automotive buildings. Two bridges in the district span the Appomattox River. The Seaboard Air Line Railroad Bridge (now the Seaboard Coast Line Railroad), a deck-plate girder viaduct bridge (erected 1930-31) lies to the northwest. The Second Street Viaduct Bridge (or Appomattox Bridge) connecting Petersburg to Colonial Heights is located to the northeast. Built in 1925, this latter, automotive bridge rests on the late 18th-century site of Pocahontas Bridge.

Due to the devastation of Petersburg from two wars and several major fires, traditional patterns of growth and expansion are not witnessed in the city's architectural fabric. The repeated destruction of and subsequent rebuilding in Petersburg, combined with mid-20th-century random demolition of historic buildings, has left the city with a curious intermingling of building types and styles. Bollingbrook Street, the mid-19th-century site of Petersburg's commercial section, is currently a light industrial area with numerous automotive-related businesses. Only a few buildings, such as the Nathaniel Friend House (27-29 Bollingbrook Street) and the Farmer's Bank (19 Bollingbrook Street), hint at the area's early 19th-century character. On N. Market Street, only the Trapezium House (244 N. Market Street) remains of an antebellum residential block.

High Street and Grove Avenue hold a diverse collection of vernacular, Late Georgian, Federal, Greek Revival, Italianate Second Empire, Romanesque Revival, Queen Anne, and Colonial/Georgian Revival buildings. Conspicuously absent from this unique assemblage are representatives of the Gothic Revival and Eastlake styles. High Street has been fortunate in retaining much of its historic integrity as a 19th-century, middle- and upper-middle-class residential street. An early 20th-century intrusion to the residential character of the street is the Seward Luggage Factory (ca. 1907). The placement of the factory in this location suggests the area's association with middle- and upper-middle-class society began to wane shortly after the turn-of-the-century. The Artwork of Petersburg (1906), a nine-volume publication of Petersburg's fashionable houses cites only one example from High Street. These factors, combined with the lack of Craftsman houses, bungalows or 1930s revival-style houses on High Street, indicate that by World War I the prosperity traditionally associated with this area had declined. Extant architecture in other sections of Petersburg indicates a move by the middle- and upper-middle-class population to both the southern portions of the city and across the river to the north.

Today, efforts are underway to revitalize the Old Town area. Thus far, adaptive reuse of industrial buildings on Old Street and the rehabilitation of houses on High Street are the most visible indicators of these ventures. The city enacted historic district zoning ordinances for the Old Town Historic District in 1973. Four other historic districts have been established within the city by the City Council.

Bollingbrook Street

Once one of Petersburg's great residential avenues, Bollingbrook Street was severely damaged by the fires of 1816 and 1826. Most buildings here were shelled during the siege of 1864-65. The western end of Bollingbrook was Petersburg's business center during the prosperous decade of the 1850s.
